I was fifteen when we first met. A native New Yorker, I was no match for the charms of this southern belle, who was like no other girl I'd ever met before - sure, she was poised and beautiful, but she was also an enigma. A mystery I would willingly spend my life unraveling...little did I know...

His skin was the color of Kraft caramels, those little squares that they keep in bins at Kroger's. Just looking at him, I could imagine the sweetness on my tongue. His sweetness. And I felt uncomfortable.

Bray Hamilton was like no one I'd ever met back home in Jackson, Mississippi. He was everything. Handsome, smart, and funny, it was no wonder all the girls in our camp wanted him. Yet, I knew my parents wouldn't approve. In our circle, Bray was taboo.....
